7	Report content	Whether you are a seasoned jogger who wants to work toward a new goal, or a no vice runner who is inspired by a friend's accomplishment of winning a race, there are many personal reasons as to why you would want to train for and run in a marathon. Sure, there are plenty of excuses not to run a 26.2-mile race. You may tell yourself it's too hard and too far. You may be scared of getting injured and don't want to lose toe nails, deal with swollen feet, or experience constant sore ness, so you talk yourself out of realizing your marathon dreams. But somewhere deep down you always go back to wondering what it would be like to put the effort into training for a marathon.
